CHILD ABUSE

What is child abuse? This can be defined as the violation of children's right. If one acts against children's rights, then this is called child abuse. Early marriage is one form of child abuse. All times some parents force their girl children into early marriage because they want wealth. This puts the child's life at risk. Many of the children who get married before the right age die while giving birth. A girl – child is probably fit for marriage at the age of eighteen years and above. This is when she is ready to handle marriage issues well. Some parents mistreat their children by depriving them of their freedom of expression. By not being allowed to talk freely, a child is living under fear.

The law does not allow a child to do hard work that is meant for adults. "Hard labour is for adults and light work for children", the law states. A child's work should depend on the age, sex and strength of the child. Work should not be taken as a form of punishment. Corporal punishment is another form of child abuse. In case a child commit a crime, they should be subjected to light punishments, counselling and warnings. A child should not be taken as a prisoner. One is fit for imprisonment when one is 18 years old. At this age one's reasoning capacity is mature enough to make independent decisions and to repent meaningfully. However, children not take the law as an excuse to do bad things or misbehave. They should remember that there is a prison for children at kampiringisa.

Children should always remember their responsibility in society and therefore live responsibly. Parents and teachers must take the lead in guiding the children on how to live meaningfully in this world. Rebels in different countries recruit children below eighteen years of age into rebel activities and come out as soldiers. This is illegal and such children once identified should be brought back to civilian life. The international law does not encourage child-soldiers. Joining the army should be at eighteen years and above.
